

BEFORE Your First Session

1

Receive Assignment Email

Don't forget to check your email daily, particularly in the "busy" assigning weeks (the 2nd week of classes until a week before the drop date). The assignment email tells you the name of the student (their preferred name), the class, the day of the week, and the time of your meeting.

2

Save the Assignment Email

A folder named "Assignments Fall 2024" or something similar in your Outlook would be helpful. You will be going back to this original email every time you send a weekly report, so you want to make sure you can always easily find it.

Put the Assignment on your Calendar

Make sure you block your own calendar with a recurring meeting so that you know you are now committed during this assigned time. You could also add the student to the meeting invite, so that they have it on their calendar as well.

4

Send Personal Email to Student

Send a personal email to the student. Introduce yourself, remind them of the day and time of your meeting, and share your eagerness for working with them. If the assignment email is sent out with LESS than 24 hours before your assigned meeting time, clarify if you will meet this week or wait until next. Always get confirmation from the student that they can meet already the next day if it is a less than 24 hour turnaround.

5

Encourage Questions in Advance

Sometimes students don't realize that we require questions (or areas to work on) in advance of our tutoring and coaching sessions. You'll talk about it in more detail when you go over the expectations in the first meeting, but encourage students to send you something in advance of your first session so you can prepare!
